You Reap What You Sow in the Middle East

By Michael Collins Piper

We need to go over there and kill those militant Muslims." That's the reaction of many Americans to the terrorist tragedy at our embassy in Libya.

Such a response demonstrates how too easily American ignorance is manipulated by the pro- Israel print and broadcast media which pushes for perpetual U.S. intervention in the conflicts of the Middle East that endanger American blood and treasure, pushing our republic ever further toward bankruptcy.

While it appears the embassy attack was the work of Islamic hard-liners, just last year the same agitators now calling for war against "those militant Muslims" demanded the U.S. take out the very Libyan leader — Kadaffi — who had a long history of cracking down on militant Muslims. And the United States did provide support to the Libyan rebels who — get this — actually included quite a few of the Islamic militants so many Americans are now eager to kill.

Meanwhile, many Americans scream for the head of Syria's Bashar Al-Assad.

Well, the United States has supported the Syrian rebels and many of them are the very Muslim militants who those Americans (who want Assad dead) are up in arms about.

Not satisfied that America has intervened enough, one of Israel's leading voices in Congress, Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) — a likely secretary of state for Mitt Romney—urges American military action in Syria.

It goes back to Saddam Hussein. Remember him? When he killed Islamic militants — when Iraq was at war with Iran — the United States and Israel thought that was a good thing.

Then, when Israel targeted Saddam for destruction, the media cried that Saddam "killed his own people," and Americans (who never thought anything about Saddam one way or the other) then wanted to go in and kill him.

Despite their own lack of real knowledge about these matters, most Americans pathetically follow the mass media's marching orders. In the end, the one thing Americans do need to know is that we have no business in the Middle East. Continued U.S. meddling in the region is making us enemies all over the planet and paving the road to America's destruction.
